WANTED

Illustration by Sam, an address service to Ohio.

From the window of his room in the Eagle Hotel, Hap Hogan looked down toward the door of the express office in the street below. Wagons and horsemen crowded the streets of Warbonnet.

But Hap had his eye on just one man, a tall, husky fellow carrying an assorted pile of baggage out through the door of the express office. Tonight Hap would be leaving town with this man as his prisoner.

Here in this town this man was known as Dan Fellows, the hard-working manager of the Western Express Company, but back in another town—four hundred miles to the east Dan Fellows had been known as Mark Lewis—a happy-go-lucky kid who'd been traveling with a wild bunch. Then one day there had been a bank robbery. Lewis hadn't known about it but the gang had used him to hold their horses while they did the job. Afterward, they'd all scattered, leaving Mark Lewis to face the music. Scared, the youngster had vanished into the hills.

For two years Hap Hogan had been rounding up the gang responsible for that robbery. Mark Lewis was the last.

That job in the express company—with plenty of money coming through in the express shipments—that would be a perfect spot for a smart operator to grab some fast money.

At that moment Hap spotted two riders clad in black and caught his breath.

"Ace and Mitch Dalton!" Hap whispered. Two of the most notorious highway-men in the west. Something big was brewing!

An instant later Hap saw the stage-coach rumbling down the street, heading for the express office. A second later Dan Fellows was helping the stage driver and the guard lower a heavy express box from the coach. From the weight of that chest Hap Hogan guessed there must be a big gold shipment locked within.

Now, suddenly, he saw the Dalton boys heading for the express office. Then all became clear to Hogan!

The Daltons were going to steal that gold shipment! And the kid was in on it with them.

Whirling, Hap raced for the street. Even as he thundered down the hotel stairway he heard the roar of gunfire outside.

By the time Hap hit the street it was all over. The Daltons lay wounded and groaning. Over them, gun in hand, stood the man called Dan Fellows!

In the shouting, noisy uproar that followed Hap felt a hand on his shoulder, and found himself looking into the eyes of Dan Fellows.

"Please," Dan said simply, "could you come back to the express office when they've all gone."

Later, when they were alone, the young man said to Hap, "I know who you are. If you'll let me explain—I've changed. I'm a different man. Just give me a chance."

"You had your chance—out there with the Daltons," said Hap, "and you came through."

"Look," said the youngster, puzzled. "I know why you're here and—"

"I'm here to find Mark Lewis," Hap cut in. "Your name is Dan Fellows. As you say, you're a different man."

When Hap Hogan rode out of town that night he rode alone.
